

There Must Be Something In The Water

On December 2nd, 1984, deadly gas leaked from a Union Carbide pesticide factory in Bhopal, India. Thousands died in a single night. What many don't know is that toxic chemicals from the abandoned factory have contaminated local groundwater and continue poisoning people today. Families still live with the devastating consequences, as a third generation of children are born with serious health conditions and disabilities.

In response to this ongoing injustice, the people of Bhopal established two extraordinary clinics. The Sambhavna Trust combines modern medicine with Ayurvedic treatments, yoga, and Panchakarma to provide holistic care to those exposed to toxic gas and contaminated water. The Chingari Rehabilitation Centre offers life-changing therapies for affected children, offering a future of hope and dignity. The Bhopal Medical Appeal is the only UK charity dedicated solely to supporting the vital work of these clinics, helping ensure free, ethical and sustainable healthcare for survivors.

The Bhopal disaster isn't over. Neither is the need for care.
